

‘Rule’ Determinations by the Government Accountability Office for Congressional Review Act Consideration

August 29, 2024

The Congressional Review Act (CRA) created a legislative mechanism to strike down final rules issued by federal agencies. Congress can overturn actions by administrative agencies only if they are first considered a “rule” under the CRA.

Agencies engage in numerous actions, and under the CRA they are required to submit to Congress only those actions that are considered “rules.” If an agency does not consider its action a rule, it does not need to be submitted to Congress. However, if a member of Congress wants an agency action to be considered a rule under the CRA, a lawmaker can ask the Government Accountability Office (GAO) to determine whether the action should be considered a rule.

While the response times vary widely, it takes the GAO on average 223 days to determine CRA eligibility, or nearly seven months. The GAO’s timeline for responses is notable, as this information is not available anywhere else. GAO has taken anywhere between a few weeks to over a year and a half to issue CRA determinations. While a majority of its determinations have resulted in submission to Congress, only a handful of those resolutions have gained any traction. Over 50% of all requests for GAO determinations have been made during the Biden Administration.

If the GAO finds that an agency’s action meets CRA’s broad definition of a rule, its report may be published in the Congressional Record, which commences the period of congressional review and green lights the CRA’s fast-track procedures for disapproval. To date, only one CRA resolution of disapproval has been signed into law following a GAO opinion.

The chart below documents the requests and GAO responses for “rule” determinations. It includes the names of the congressional requesters, the GAO’s opinion, and the amount of time that it took to respond to each request for a rule determination – dating back to the first GAO opinion issued in response to a “rule” determination request in 1996.
