

‘Rule’ Determinations by the Government Accountability Office for Congressional Review Act Consideration

October 17, 2025

The Congressional Review Act (CRA) created a legislative mechanism to strike down final rules issued by federal agencies. Congress can overturn actions by administrative agencies only if they are first considered a “rule” under the CRA.

Agencies engage in numerous actions, and under the CRA they are required to submit to Congress only those actions that are considered “rules.” If an agency does not consider its action a rule, it does not need to be submitted to Congress. However, if a member of Congress wants an agency action to be considered a rule under the CRA, a lawmaker can ask the Government Accountability Office (GAO) to determine whether the action should be considered a rule.

While the response times vary widely, it takes the GAO an average of 199 days to determine CRA eligibility, or about six and a half months. The GAO’s timeline for responses is notable. GAO has taken anywhere between a few weeks to over a year and a half to issue CRA determinations. While a majority of its determinations have resulted in submission to Congress, only a few of those resolutions have gained any traction. Just over 45% of all requests for GAO determinations have been made during the Biden Administration.

If the GAO finds that an agency’s action meets CRA’s broad definition of a rule, its report may be published in the Congressional Record, which commences the period of congressional review and green lights the CRA’s fast-track procedures for disapproval.

The chart below documents the requests and GAO responses for “rule” determinations. It includes the names of the congressional requesters, the GAO’s opinion, and the amount of time that it took to respond to each request for a rule determination – dating back to the first GAO opinion issued in response to a “rule” determination request in 1996.
